Part C: Reading Comprehension

Jack London (1876-1916) was an American novelist and short-story writer, who filled his work with exciting experiences from his own life. He was born in San Francisco, California, and spent his childhood on the Waterfront of San Francisco Bay, mostly among the docks and ships of the city of Oakland. He never saw his real father. His mother and stepfather were poor, so Jack sold newspapers and worked on an ice wagon to help support the family.

When he was ten, he discovered books. He liked sea stories best, and wished to go to sea. He bought a boat when he was 15, and at the age of 17, he became a sailor on a ship hunting seals in the North Pacific. He wrote about this in his first published story, "Typhoon off the Coast of Japan."

His time on the ship made London restless, and shortly after his return he wandered across the United States. When he was 19, he returned to Oakland to enter high school. He studied almost 19 hours a day and worked as a school cleaner, too. He finished four years of work in one year. While a student he became interested in socialism. London began to study at the University of California at Berkeley, but left to join the rush for a quick fortune in Alaska.

Gold was discovered in the Klondike region of Alaska in 1896, and London went there in 1897 to spend the winter. He returned without having mined any gold, but he recreated his adventures in The Son of the Wolf (1900) and The Call of the Wild (1903), the story of a dog that escapes civilization to lead a wolf group.
