

Particles within a solid are packed together very tightly in fixed positions. This makes it difficult for the solid to change shape.

Particles within a liquid are close together but they can slide past each other and change places. Because of this, liquids can change shape easily.

Particles within a gas are spaced far apart. This is why gases can have any shape. They can also be squashed easily.

